We provide a description of accountability mechanisms in the education sector of Pakistan, while also comparing the effectiveness between public and private schools. We focus on school inputs in the form of school amenities, teacher availability and quality, and school output as measured by student learning. The study highlights the disparities in school inputs and outputs across the public and private sectors. Despite the higher resource availability in public schools, private schools often outperform public schools. We hypothesize the importance of accountability mechanisms in explaining differences in school performance. In particular, incentives must reward performance in order for school workers to exert effort.
